

Energy Leadership

A Quick Guide to the 7 Energy Levels

We each operate through a combination of 7 levels of energy during the course of the day. The highest levels of energy are Anabolic. These are fueling, expanding, healing and growth oriented energy levels which help us take action for positive, long-term results. The lowest levels are Catabolic. This is draining, resisting and contracting energy which provides us with an energetic boost to combat what is perceived to be a stressful situation. Whilst it may offer some short-term benefits, catabolic energy may also distract us and limit our view of a situation. In the long-term, this energy is potentially destructive to you and those around you.

Each thought we have, has an energetic consequence. No energy level is considered good or bad, they each have their advantages and disadvantages.

Identifying how the levels show up in our personal energetic profile and in our energetic stress reaction, enables us to understand how our energy is working for and against us. By creating this awareness, you increase the options available to you. In turn, this enables you to make a shift in your consciousness, increase your energy and moves you from functioning effectively to functioning optimally.
